

CAIN's Campaign Gains High Profile Support

NEWS RELEASE: October 26, 2006

TORONTO: Citizens of all backgrounds and political parties have stepped up to support Ward 6 city council candidate Jem Cain. Last night an enthusiastic coffee-party crowd at Lakeshore's Yalla Café included Ruth Grier, former minister of health and the environment, and Blake Kinahan, former metro councillor.

"Jem Cain has shown by her record of hard work, genuine consultation and leadership, that she can protect our neighbourhoods and improve our community. We need someone like Jem to stand up for the Lakeshore at City Hall," said Grier.

"The campaign is really building," said Cain. "People clearly want change, and they know I will listen to their concerns as councillor." Speaking to a packed crowd Jem reiterated her campaign promises to open a constituency office in the ward, improve public transit and address concerns over crime and vandalism in the area.

Jem Cain has lived in Etobicoke-Lakeshore her entire life. She is dedicated to the community, and has demonstrated her commitment by leading the opposition to a concrete batching plant near homes, the lack of public consultation and the location of a skateboard park in Colonel Samuel Smith Park, a naturalized environmentally-sensitive area. The community won all three issues. She is a founding member of New Toronto Good Neighbours. Visit www.jemcain.ca for more information.
